"Planet Earth's Home of View-Master 3D Reels"

This is a greeting card produced by Mattel for its workers in 1999 to commemorate the 60th anniversary of View-Master. In 2001 the plant in Portland was shut down due to toxic waste problems and the manufacture of View-Master reels was moved to Mexico. The smiling employees do not betray the fact that there was carcinogenic toxic waste in the drinking water of the plant.

This is probably the last set of 3D pictures available of the plant because the buildings have been torn down and the water tower was finally demolished in 2005 to make way for a shopping center. As of 2015 there are still a few of these greeting cards available that were never sent out. Unfortunately the pictures had already shown signs of reddening due to the inferior film stock used after 1976. The pictures shown in this document were color corrected and scanned to 4k+ resolution. The pictures have been refocused and noise reduced, but due to the deterioration the results were not as good as I would have liked. When new, the original pictures may have had a slightly reddish cast so the final results may not be exactly like the originals.

If the pictures are printed and trimmed to 7 inches width they can be viewed in a Holmes-Bates stereoscope. Holmes-Bates stereoscopes are available used or new as kits or finished products at various stores on the web. As of April 2015 3DStereo.com has both viewers and copies of this greeting card for sale.

The last picture in the set has a sign which is obviously a lenticular 3D print. It should have been placed at the optimum angle for good 3D display.
